Drivers Think They Drive Well

Canadian scientists have found that most drivers think they are better than others behind the wheel. The team from Ottawa University asked nearly 400 motorists of all ages. They all had to answer questions about what they thought of their own driving skills. The question topics included how they react in different driving conditions, including terrible weather and traffic jams. They then had to rate the skills of others on the road. The results were very similar across all age groups – almost all of those questioned believed their driving ability was better than that of other drivers. Older drivers were more confident in their ability than younger ones. Unsurprisingly, perhaps, males had the most confidence in their ability to drive a car.

Sylvain Gagnon believes the attitudes found in his survey could be dangerous. Mr Gagnon said that although confidence can be a good thing, it often has dangerous consequences. He said: “If you think that you are a better driver, then perhaps you start behaving differently behind the wheel and do not pay as much attention as you should. This might explain why young men tend to have more accidents on the roads than other drivers.” It is time for government road safety departments to start taking such opinions more seriously. Traffic accidents are a huge killer throughout the world. Very few drivers really think about how deadly their car can be in an accident. More regulation is needed as people buy more and more cars.
